Tips for Asking Your Current Employer to Work Remotely

Here's just a few examples of people I've seen take their existing role and turn it into a remote position:

- Secretary takes her role remote and works as a Virtual Assistant. Her existing employer becomes her first client!
- Bookkeeper logs in from her remote office in Ecuador and work from there for 12 months.
- Web developer moves out from the company office and works from remotely from London
- Medical transcriber moves out from the busy distracting office to her home by the beach
- Typist takes her skills online and starts working from Malaysia enabling her to fulfil her dream of volunteering overseas.

You may say ... “My boss will never agree to it.”

Working from a remote office isn't so unusual nowadays. The telecommuting workforce is growing and so is openness to the idea. If you prepare right, approach your boss the right way and know how to overcome objections – your working remote dream is very possible.

Here are a few things for you to consider ...

- What would make it possible for you to do your job or parts of your job remotely
- What benefits will your boss and company get from you working from a remote office
- What technology you will need to do your job remotely
- What are the likely objections your boss will make to the idea of you starting to work remotely
- What communication tools and document sharing tools you'll need to stay connected to other team members and your clients
- How you help your boss and co-workers to still “feel your presence” in the office, even though you are not physically there

Pathway Two

What Can You Do To Earn An Income From Anywhere In The World? 3 Steps To Help You Weigh Up Your Options ...

1. Make a list of ALL your assets, skills, knowledge & talents (don't just think your current role – think past positions, volunteer positions, your natural talents, knowledge you've collected over the years) Be as detailed as you can).
2. Beside each of the things you've listed, list out all of the people, businesses organisations, groups etc. that would find value in what it is you can do for them.
3. For each of those areas brainstorm ways that your service or product could be offered remotely while travelling ... ie online, in person at various locations around the world. What is the best way to connect your offering with the people who will value from it the most?
